Institute of Social Psychology
Lecturer in Social Psychology / Organisational Social Psychology
Salary: £40,634 - £47,047pa incl

Applications are invited from outstanding candidates in the field of social psychology / organisational social psychology. Applications are especially welcome from those with research interests relating to organisational change, economic life, communities –online and local, communication or creativity.

You must have a completed PhD, teaching experience and an established or emerging track record of excellent research. We expect commitment to engage critically with inter-disciplinarity and real-world applied research, multiple methodologies and psychology as a social science.

The Institute of Social Psychology has been for half a century the home of Societal Psychology and a leading centre for research in the real world. We do field research on five continents, house four peer-reviewed journals and our student population is global, with more than 50 nationalities. We also have a thriving research student community.

Our current domains of interest are organisational social psychology, community development and health, social and cultural psychology, social and public communication and consumer psychology. Collegiality is one of our values; we want an open team player who will engage and contribute to our current research and teaching.
